SHERRILYN SWEET

Growing up in New York is not easy, especially in some of the rougher neighbourhoods. Your father was a dockworker and your mother stayed at home with a string of children. You are the middle of five sisters and four brothers. A large family to say the least. Poverty was the most defining aspect of your family. As if things weren't bad enough, when the war came two of your brothers and your father went off to fight. Only the youngest of the brothers returned. As if life wasn't hard enough, in 1928 America was hit by a depression when Wall Street crashed. Your whole family quickly found themselves on the streets.

There had to be something more to this. You were always the quiet one in the family, always the one that stayed out of trouble. You were, secretly, the brightest and would hide away from everyone else, various books that you'd stolen. Knowledge is power, but power can be dangerous. You taught yourself to read and write, and in those pages of black and white you discovered worlds other than the one you knew.

You stole your books indiscriminately, stealing anything and reading them fanatically. One day, as fate would have it, you stole a book by a man called Aleister Crowley and discovered a world of magic. Suddenly you found yourself being choosy. You found yourself wanting to know more. You would disappear from your family for days at a time seeking out books on the occult and the supernatural. You would absorb this knowledge, sometimes going for several days without a scrap to eat and without moving from one spot as you read and read and read . . .

Everything changed one day when you stole a book and a cop chased you down the street. When he caught you and found what you were reading, rather than give you a bashing he began to talk to you, and, of all things, about the occult. You realised quickly, that this was no ordinary New York cop, and it wasn't long before you were meeting him regularly as he lent you books to read. He also gave you books on Egypt and Egyptian mythology. Eventually, the day came when he offered to help you out of your rut and to get you back on your feet.

You joined the Cult of Isis seeking to learn more in return for your helping them. They arranged for you to get a job at the library where you have been the perfect librarian, always absorbed in her books and knowing where everything is.

You still see the cop, Lou, every now and again and have grown friends with him. He's a nice man, and perhaps he shouldn't know where your main magical interests lie.

Personal Aspects: Despite your prior life on the streets you have become quite the Middle American, trying to escape that past. You dress fairly plainly, and very primly. You need to wear glasses because of all the reading you did in poor lighting as a child, but you don't mind too much. You know that you are intellectually superior to everyone, but you don't see the need to flaunt it. You are far more interested in the contents of a book. You always have at least three or four useful tomes close by your side. At 23 you have mousy hair and grey eyes. You have a sleek and agile body, but lack physical strength by virtue of your sheer lack of exercise. You are always looking for the bigger picture, and you will usually observe a situation carefully before you hasten to give advice, which you will eventually. You try not to let people know exactly where your occult interests lie. They probably wouldn't understand. Despite appearances, you know that you're not the prim and proper little missy everyone thinks that you are.

Opinions of others:

Mandek: Fascinating. You must find out as much about him as you can.

Elita Fortier: Clearly intelligent, but a quite probably a rich bitch. However, she may have some valuable books as an academic and therefore you might be willing to forgive any social transgressions if she will make you privy to her library at some point.

Charles Forthroy III: What a charming young man. He's the son of an English lord. You've always liked the English accent.

Adranio Menendez y de Chavel: A kindred spirit living life on the street through crime. You admire him.

Pablo Menendez y de la Fuente: He's actually kind of sexy. Not quite your type so far as men in general go, but he's got the attraction of a man living the life of a skilled thief.

Lou Macbride: He's a good friend. He looks out for you, and you trust him implicitly.

Cult of Isis: You want to become a Watcher. They probably have some fascinating old tomes.
